The title grabs my attention and made me wonder what Ashley was going to write about.

Is there a clear thesis statement? What is it? Can it be argued from supporting or opposing sides?

The thesis is somewhat clear. From what I do understand is that the essay is collecting evidence on police brutality and its connection to racism through the use of a tv show: Seven Second and real life experiences.

Do you agree or disagree? Why? Why not?

I like the topic that she picked and I agree with her thesis. Even though her thesis includes the use of a tv show, it is emphasizing on the societal representation that is created while also paying attention to real life situations as well.

Where is the thesis located?

The thesis is located in the introduction paragraph

Arrangement

I think this is the most effective arrangement for her essay because it made sense and it work

What objections do you have to this argument?

Absolutely nothing I really liked everything she had in her essay.

Circle the opposing viewpoints included? Are they valid and significant reasons to disagree with the writer? Are there enough?

The opposing points are valid and significant. It is equally strong and enough for Ashley to refute it.

Are you convinced by the conclusion? Why or why not? What else did you want to know?

Yes because she summed everything up perfectly and ended with a bang.

What additional information needs to be presented before you can believe the writer has proven and rested their case?

Absolutely nothing I really liked everything she had in her essay.

What is the most interesting thing you learned about this topic?

“Justice system define force in two different ways, ‘Necessary force is the amount of force given to control a given situation...Excessive force is any use of force beyond that is required for safety.’ ”

What else would convince you to believe the writer is correct?
